

Session 7: Planning The Prospect's Experience

In Session 7, you'll learn how to script out your business friendships. You'll also get a step-by-step formula for doing this and steps to take action once you're done.

- Typically, when 2 people meet they start figuring out where they have something in common.
- When you have a substantial connection with someone you tend to open up to having a relationship with them. As you're connecting with new customers, try to connect on something substantial.
- The next step in building a friendship, is when one person discloses something personal about themselves. By sharing a vulnerable part of who you are it will help others feel more comfortable with you.
- Next, make sure the other person is on the receiving end of more value. The relationship should be tilted in the favor of your potential "business friend". Formula: give, give, give, get.
- Remember: You're going to be creating an experience for another person. You have to project yourself into their shoes. Here is where it's important to think about being your customer avatar.
- Next, script the entire relationship from start to finish.
 - ▶ Start with a 30 day timeline.
 - ▶ Script out the entire experience from day 1 to day 30.
 - ▶ What's their first contact with you going to be?
 - ▶ When they come to your website, what are you going to give them for free in return for opting in?
 - ▶ What's your website going to look like?
 - ▶ What's your follow up sequence going be?
 - ▶ How are you going to create content that's interesting to them and leads to marketing your product or service?
 - ▶ Once they buy, are you going offer another product in line?
- Then, go to work to create this experience. Start putting individual people through it and see how they respond.
